

bptw partnership to offer new planning services

For immediate release

1 September 2007

From September 2007 the practice is expanding and is launching a fifth discipline – planning services. The first appointment has been made and we are delighted that Mark Gibney is joining us as Head of Planning.

Mark takes up his new role from 3rd September. He brings with him a wealth of experience and knowledge of current planning policies particularly in London and the Thames Gateway area and has been responsible for delivering planning permissions a number of complex projects over recent years. Mark will be continuing his work on several major schemes working with other architects and is looking forward to his new role working with a wide range of clients and consultants.

Prior to joining bptw partnership Mark was a Director at Savills Hephher Dixon where bptw successfully collaborated with him on a number of projects, and previously a Development Control Manager at the London Borough of Lewisham where he was closely involved with several projects designed by bptw. As a result Mark is particularly familiar with the practice's work from various perspectives.
